

Act report

Written by: Felipe Godoy

We all know that the twitter account "WeRateDogs" evaluates dogs in a humorous and not very serious way, so you would think that you can't get more information from it. This is not far from reality, since from a brief analysis in which the data was obtained, sorted and cleaned, you can get interesting data about these cute dogs.

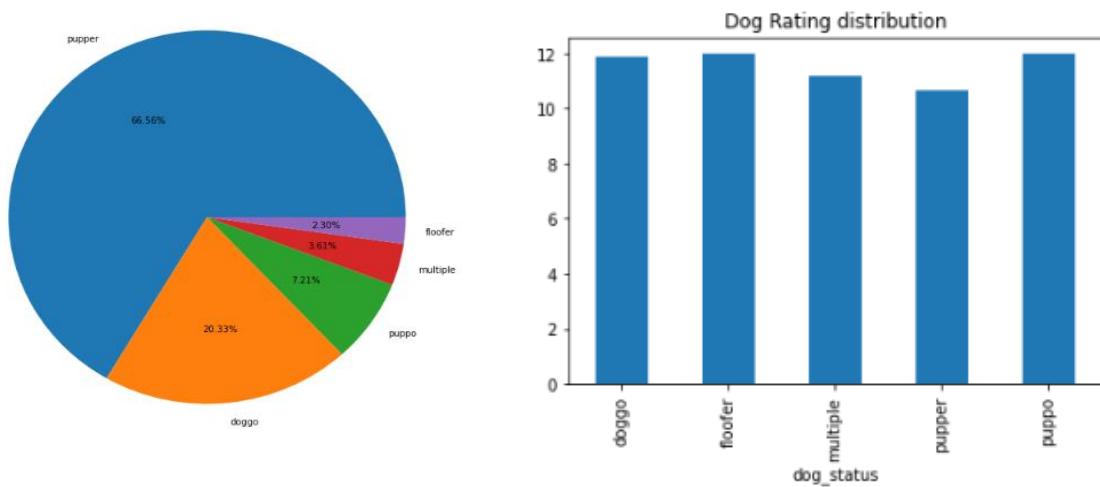

I think it is interesting to start with a fact not very associated with dogs, and is that most of the contributions that are made to this account are made through an iPhone (Apple users hate cats would be a good theory to investigate later), another important fact that draws attention at this point is that once the database of retweets is cleaned, the source "Vine - Make a Scene" disappears, which suggests that this platform is used mostly for retweeting.

It can be seen that the number of tweets made to this page has been decreasing over time. Rather than a drop in popularity, I would associate it to the fact that the account had a strong start due to the novelty, followed by a stabilization over the years (a stability in the number of tweets is observed since April 2016).

Although the data to analyze are relatively few (given that people often omit this data), it can be inferred that the "pupper" stage is the most tweeted. Conversely, it is the category with the lowest rating (although this is not conclusive, just a sample).

Although there are many dogs without an age category, the rating in general does not vary much (although there are cases with votes over 100 points).

Finally, the names Charlie, Cooper and Oliver are the most used names for dogs.